
As viewers walk through the sculpture they will hear stories about Steelton, the steel mill, and family histories—a soundtrack derived from Browne’s interviews, which explore the reality of living in a small town with a single-industry economy where job opportunities have declined considerably since the 1950s. Today the situation is far from over: As the steel plant changes hands again, it is important to document the existence of Steelton and the mill through the stories told by generations of local families and union members and to examine how these narratives help them make decisions about the future now.

Kate Browne has been working since 2008 on the international COCOON series, which examines sites of forced and voluntary migrations and the epidemics that follow. She has created Cocoons—works incorporating installations and performances—in Paris; Mexico City; Greenwood and Jackson, Mississippi; the Bronx; Miskolc, Hungary; and, most recently, Steelton, Pennsylvania. Browne grew up in rural Pennsylvania, graduated from Hampshire College, and now lives in New York City. Eric Etheridge has photographed Kate Browne’s COCOON projects since 2008. He is also author and photographer of Breach of Peace: Portraits of the 1961 Mississippi Freedom Riders.

Thanks to the United Steel Workers Local 1688, for partnering with Kate Browne on the project since 2019.

Museum visitors are invited to attend Kate Browne’s artist talk on March 8, 2024 at 5:30 pm.
